

I signed up for the national and Indiana no-call list specifically to relieve our household from the aggravation and inconvenience of unsolicited annoying interruptions. I pay for phone service for my convenience, not to be harassed by someone else for their advantage. By requesting telephone access to me just because I am a customer, the Consumer Banking Industry is overstepping the consumer's whole intent of signing up for the no-call list. If my bank wants to solicit additional business from me, they've got my address. I'll give whatever attention I believe the correspondence deserves at my own convenience.
